THE CORNISH GIANT,

On one occasion they had lain down nine corpses, and Payne was bringing in another, tucked under his arm, like one of "the kittens" of his school-boy days, when all as once the supposed dead man was heard ploading earnestly with him, and expostulating, Surely you wouldn't bury me, Mr. Payne, before I am dead?" "I tell thee, man," was before I am dead!" "I tell thee, man," was the grim reply, "our trench was dug for ten, and there's nine in already; you must take your place." "But I bean't dead, I say; I haven't done living yet; be masayful, Mr. Payne; don't ye hurry a poor fellow into the earth before his time." "I won't hurry theer I mean to put thee down quietly and cover thee up, and then thee canst die at thy letsure." Payne's purpose, however, was kin ter than his speech. He carried his suppliant carefully, to his own cottage, not far off, and charged his wife to stanch, if possible, her husband's rebellious blood, The man lived, and his descendants are among the principal inhabitants of the town of Stratton to the

That same year, the battle of Lanedown near Eath, was fought. The forces of the parliament prevailed, and Sir Beville nobly died. Payne was still at his side, and when his master fell he mounted young John Grand ville, a youth of sixteen, whom he had always in charge, on his father's horse, and led the Granville troop into the fight. A letter which the faithful retainer to his lady at Stows still survives. It broathes, in the quaint language of the day, a noble strain of sympathy and homage. Thus it ran :-"HONORED MADAM: Ill news flieth at ace The heavy tidings no doubt hath already travelled to Stowe that we have lost our blessed master by the enemy's advantage. You must not, dear lady, grieve too much for your noble spouse. You know, as we all believe, that his soul was in heaven before his bones were cold. He fell, as he did often tell us he wished to die, in the great Stua to cause, for his country and his king. He dolivered to me his last commands, and with such tender words for you and for his child ren as are not to be set down with my poor pen, but must come to your cars upon my best heart's breath. Master John, when I mounted him on his father's horse, rode him lute the war like a young prince, as he lay and our men followed him with their awordd drawn and with tears in their eyes. They did say they woulk kill a rebel for every hair of Sir Beville's board. But I bade them remember their good master's word when he wiped his sword after Stamford fight; how he said, when their cry was 'Stab and slay!" 'Halt men; God will avenge! I am coming down with the mouran fullest load that ever a poor servant did bear, to bring the great heart that is cold to Kirkhampton vault. Ony lady!how shall I ever brook your weeping face! Bat I will be ever brook your weeping face! Bat I will be trothful to the living and to the dead.

"These, honored Madam, from thy sad dost truest servant.

"Anyony Payne."

At the Restoration, the Stowe Giant reaps

At the Restoration, the Stown Giant reappears upon the scene, in attendance on his young master, John Granville. Eir Beville's son had been instrumental in return of the king, and had received from Charles the Second largesse of money, great offices, and rhe earlidom of Bath. Among other places of trust, he was appointed Governor of the Garrison at Plymouth. There Payne received the appointment of Halberdier of the Guns, and the king, who held him in singular favor, commanded his portrait to be painted by the court artist, Sir Godfrey Kneller. The fate of this picture was one of great viceisitude. It hung in state for some years in the great gallery at Stowe; thence, when that mansion was dismantled, at the death of the Earl of Bath, it was removite Penheale, another manor-house of the Granvilles, in Cornwall; but it cassed to be highly agreement. at the death of the Earl of Bath, it was removto Penheale, another manor-house of the Granvilles, in Cornwall; but it ceased to be highly esteemed, from the ignorace of the people and the oblivion of years, insomuch so that when Gilbert, the Cornish historian, travelled though the county to collect materials for his work, he discovered the portrait rolled up in an empty room, and described by the farmer's wife as "a carpot with the effigy of a large man upon it." Is was a gift to her husband, she said, from the landlord's steward, and she was glad to sell it as she did for eight pounds!
